As to claims 22, 25 and 26, the prior art of record does not teach or render obvious the limitations recited in claim 22, when taken in the context of the claims as a whole, specific to a distributed printing system including an asset managing system comprising printing device management and service applications, a service host system comprising printing device subscribable service applications, and multiple printing devices, all connected via network communication, a common device model agent (DMA) module included in each of the printing device; wherein the DMA including a common application programming interface, a first DMA application for monitoring the printing device event and generate corresponding actions, a second DMA application for performing dynamic update of printing device services including adding new service code that can be subscribed by the printing device and selectively initiated by the printing device, and a service manager application for executing the first and the second DMA applications and for providing interactive communication with the asset management system and the service host system; via the DMA module, the printing device is able to subscribe to service applications, requesting for user selected service during a scheduled check in with the asset management system, the asset forward the request to the service host system, and the service host system determine the eligibility of the request based on the subscribing information provided by the user, and notifies the asset management system of the result, the DMA module receives the eligibility result from the asset management system and download the service code from the service host system if eligible, and the DMA module executes the service code using the common application programming interface.

Moreover, evidence for modifying the prior art teachings by one of ordinary skill level in the art was not uncovered so as to result in the invention as recited in claims 22, 25 and 26.
